

Cherry Blossom Case Study: Question 17

Introduction

There is a lot of data available freely on the internet. For this case study, we will be practicing scraping data off of the Cherry Blossom Ten Mile Run in Washington D.C website to answer a question of our choice from the Nolan and Lang textbook.

Question 17 (p.102 from textbook)

In Section 2.7, we discovered that the HTML file for the male 2000 results was so poorly formatted that `htmlParse()` was unable to fix it to allow us to extract the text table from the `<pre>` tag. In this exercise, we programmatically edit this HTML file so that we can use `htmlParse()` as desired. To do this, begin by reading the HTML file located at <http://www.cherryblossom.org/cb003m.htm> using `readLines()`. Carefully examine the HTML displayed in Section 2.7 and come up with a plan for correcting it. Consider whether you want to drop ``s or close them properly. Once you have fixed the problem so that the `<pre>` tag contains the text table, pass your corrected HTML to `htmlParse()`. You may want to use a text connection to do this rather than writing the file to disk and reading it in.

Background

The Cherry Blossom Ten Mile Run is annually held in Washington D.C. in early April. The run began as a “training run for elite runners who were planning to compete in the Boston Marathon” [1] There were around 17,000 runners participating in the race as of 2012. The results of the race are published to <http://www.cherryblossom.org/> every year.

Methods

From page 94 in the textbook, we loaded the XML library and set our base url to `http://www.cherryblossom.org/`. For question 17, we are only interested in the year 2000 male results. In order to isolate the 2000 men’s results, we used `results/2000/Cb003m.htm` in the paste function.

#Loading in the package

library(XML)
```

#This is the base url

```
ubase<-"http://www.cherryblossom.org/"
```

#This is the suffix url to get the 2000 year results

```
url<-paste0(ubase, "results/2000/Cb003m.htm", sep = "")
```

#Print the URL

print(url)
```

```
[1] "http://www.cherryblossom.org/results/2000/Cb003m.htm"
```

We attempted to use the `htmlParse` function to see what would happen before we modified the nodes.

```
#Let's try to use htmlParse to see what happens before we do anything
```

```
doc <- htmlParse(url)

preNode = getNodeSet(doc, "//pre")

print(preNode)
```

# Under USATF OPEN guideline * Under USATF Age-Group guideline
</pre>

#preNode2 still looks a little funny with &#13; at the end, but we now have the data that we didn't have #after looking this up, that appears to be a carriage return

Results

The code above shows the process taken to rewrite the html file to pull from the “//pre” designation. By removing “font and font color” header and subbing “font and font color PRE Strong” header for “PRE Strong”, allows `htmlparse()` to parse the html file with the “//pre” header. Therefore, once `htmlparse` is passed through `getNodeSet` is able to pull from “//pre” to obtain the year 2000 Cherry Blossom Ten Mile data.

Conclusions/Discussions

There are many ways to rewrite the html file to allow for `htmlparse` to have the table to be pulled easier. Some ways as suggested by the book is to find another way to properly nest the headers to allow for “//pre” to not be empty or even deleting the “/font” header entirely. Our example of re-organizing headers is one possible way to pull data from the “//pre” header. By changing the header name, it is possible to have “//pre” not be an empty set.
